Philosophy and metaphysics

In the modern age, the most influential philosophers are generally considered to be

The Modern Era (1800–1900) was characterized by a broadening interest in the study of abstract ideas. In the first phase of the Modern Era, a series of philosophical movements developed, each with a different emphasis. The first phase was the Enlightenment, which began in the 17th century and continued through the 18th century. The Enlightenment was marked by a belief in reason and a rejection of traditional authority. The second phase of the Modern Era was the Romantic Period, which began in the late 18th century and continued through the 19th century. The Romantic Period was marked by a focus on individualism and a rejection of rationalism. The third phase of the Modern Era was the Critical Period, which began in the late 19th century and continued through the 20th century. The Critical Period was marked by a focus on the critical examination of philosophical ideas.

The Modern Era is often characterized by a belief in the power of reason and a rejection of tradition. The Enlightenment was marked by a belief in reason and a rejection of traditional authority. The Romantic Period was marked by a focus on individualism and a rejection of rationalism. The Critical Period was marked by a focus on the critical examination of philosophical ideas.

The Modern Era is often characterized by a belief in the power of reason and a rejection of tradition. The Enlightenment was marked by a belief in reason and a rejection of traditional authority. The Romantic Period was marked by a focus on individualism and a rejection of rationalism. The Critical Period was marked by a focus on the critical examination of philosophical ideas.

The Modern Era is often characterized by a belief in the power of reason and a rejection of tradition. The Enlightenment was marked by a belief in reason and a rejection of traditional authority. The Romantic Period was marked by a focus on individualism and a rejection of rationalism. The Critical Period was marked by a focus on the critical examination of philosophical ideas.